Constructive learning theory is an effective approach for teaching and assessing learning in a variety of contexts. While constructivism has been used in medical education, the application of this approach to teaching physical and sexual health content has not been investigated. The purpose of this study was to determine whether a constructivist-based learning environment can be developed to teach physical and sexual health content to a diverse group of students. Two hundred and forty-two student teaching assistants in a second-year clinical skills course were given the opportunity to teach a course on the physical and sexual health differences between males and females. In addition to traditional lecture format and peer teaching, a constructivist-based learning environment was developed. Data were collected from in-class and exam questions, student surveys, and a post-course survey. Results indicate that the constructivist-based learning environment was well received by the majority of students and that this method was successful in preparing students to teach on this topic. This study highlights the success of using constructivist theory to teach content on a course that normally uses didactic instruction.Q: Calculus question confusion Question: what is the smallest natural number  $n$  such that
